Not illustrated. 1915 Excerpt: .excess of carbon dioxide we breathe a little deeper; so we always take in just enough outside air to reduce the proportion of our hypothetical excretion in the air of the lungs to whatever may be its normal proportion for the individual concerned. The regulation is brought about by the CO₂, and the concentration of expired products in the air of the lungs is thus always kept at a normal uniform level. Mr. McCann: I have spent a good many nights on sleeping cars, and I don t find so much trouble from the CO, content as the fact that I Catch cold from the overheating of the cars, while sleeping. There should be something done to regulate the temperature of the cars. I think this is something that Dr. Crowder probably could assist us in materially. If he would advocate some kind of regulation to make excessive heat impossible. A test was made some years ago arid twenty-five roads were asked for their data for figuring the amount of radiation that goes into coaches and they varied all the way from V/2 sq. ft. per hundred cubic feet up to 8 sq. ft. and they were all running in the northern winter zone. Dr. Crowder: Yes, the direction of the wind sometimes has a marked effect on the ventilation. One of the main points in the comparisons was to determine what type of ventilator is least affected by adverse winds. Of course, if we are...
