Knowing the number of cubic yards, estimate the number of thousand feet board measure of forms required to encase the concrete to be placed in a day. This will give the minimum amount of lumber required, for it is never permissible to move the forms until the concrete has hardened over night. This brings us to a very important question in economics. Thousands of words have been written on the advantages and disadvantages of using wet or dry concrete, but I have never seen mention of one of the most forceful objections to the use of concrete mixed so wet that it is sloppy. I refer to the slowness with which such concrete hardens. Obviously, the more slowly it hardens, the longer must the forms be left in place; and the longer the forms are left in place the more lumber will be required; the more the lumber, the greater the cost of forms per cubic yard of concrete. A concrete mixed dry, and rammed, will harden over night, so that in retaining wall construction it is safe to remove the forms the next morning; but, where the concrete has been mixed sloppy, I have seen whole sections of wall fall out upon...
