Excerpt from The Way of the Eagle In order that any one who may chance to read this book of letters may better understand the detailed descriptions of fights in the air which it contains, certain fundamental facts of a more or less technical nature should be at all times kept clearly in mind. As every one knows, there are many different types of aeroplimes specially adapted to as many different uses. Among these there are three distinct classes which cannot be confused without resulting in an almost complete failure to appreciate the tactics of air fighting. These three classes are: first, the small single-seater fighting plane known to the French as an avion de chasse, to the English as a scout, and to the American Air Service as a pursuit machine. Next comes the larger type used for the taking of photographs and gathering of information, the regulation of artillery fire, liaison work with the infantry, and the dropping of bombs from high altitudes during the daytime. This type usually carries two, sometimes three, men. Finally we have the great multi-motored bomber equipped with two, three or four engines and carrying a crew of from two to eight men. The pursuit plane is the smallest and fastest of all flying machines and has almost always carried but one man. Typical of this type are the French Spad and Nieuport, the English S. E. 5 and Sopwith Camel, and for the Germans the Albatross, the Pfalz, and the Fokker. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
